

VETERINARY TECHNICIAN

Veterinary technicians perform valuable medical and non-medical services in our clinical practice. They are graduates of an AVMA CVTEA-accredited veterinary technology program and usually have an Associates or Baccalaureate degree. The veterinary technician is educated and trained to support our veterinarians by assisting with surgery, laboratory procedures, radiography, anesthesiology, treatment and nursing, and client education. Often, veterinary technicians pursue specialties in emergency and critical care, anesthesiology, internal medicine, animal behavior, or dentistry. Personal attributes that contribute to the success of a Vet Tech include a strong science background, an ability to work well with people and animals, and excellent communication and decision-making skills.

VETERINARY ASSISTANT

Our veterinary assistants support the veterinarian and/or the veterinary technician in their daily tasks. The assistant may be asked to perform kennel work, assist in the restraint and handling of animals, feed and exercise the animals, or spend time on clerical duties. The ability to listen, communicate efficiently, and handle multiple assignments are skills that make a veterinary assistant an important member of the hospital team. (Credit for a portion of these job descriptions go to: AVMA.org) A typical day at our hospitals can include a variety of other personnel, including Externs and Volunteers. Everyone has an important role to play in living our core values and assuring the health and well-being of the hospital's patients and the owners who care for them. Our clients and their pets deserve extraordinary care.

RECEPTIONIST/CLIENT SERVICE REPRESENTATIVE

Our receptionists or client service representatives are usually the first person to welcome a client into the hospital and the last person the client sees when they leave. The interactions he or she has with a client can determine how the client perceives the quality of medical services being offered, so this is a key position. A receptionist must have excellent communication skills and be able to handle a variety of questions and requests from clients and the public. In addition to setting appointments, responding to inquiries about hospital services, greeting clients, and managing callbacks, a receptionist may also perform accounting, marketing, or client-counseling duties. A customer service-focused attitude, the ability to manage multiple tasks, and professionalism under stress are important attributes for this position.
